Director of Venture Philanthropy Strategy and New Programs Development

Dr. Barnaby Marsh joined the John Templeton Foundation in the fall of 2002 as Director of Venture Philanthropy Strategy and New Programs Development. He plays a lead role in the process of developing innovative and entrepreneurial practices in philanthropy, in the identification and development of new program areas and in strategic aspects of general outreach and communications.

Dr. Marsh is a summa cum laude graduate of Cornell University and attended Magdalen College, Oxford, as a Rhodes Scholar. His academic work focuses on integrating biological, economic and psychological models for a better understanding of strategic decision making. He has held academic fellowships at the Hebrew University (Jerusalem), the Smithsonian Institution (Washington), the Max Planck Institute (Berlin), and New College, Oxford, where he is currently a Research Fellow.

In addition to his academic work, Dr. Marsh has held positions in global strategy consulting, financial derivatives, insurance markets and the oil industry. He is also interested in issues relating to global stewardship, resource use and in studies of human wisdom.

Dr. Marsh is an avid skier, outdoorsman, birdwatcher and golfer. He has undertaken extensive natural history travel in Alaska, Mexico, India, the Middle East and in many locations in Europe and the United States.
